Historic Strawberry Mansion is celebrated as the largest historic home within picturesque Fairmount Park.

The experience provided by a visit to Historic Strawberry Mansion is enriched by a magnificent collection of period antiques, collectibles, and decorative arts, some having originated from George Washington’s President’s House in Philadelphia. The Mansion is home to the Sesquicentennial Doll Collection, a wonderful exhibit representing antique dolls from across the United States.

The Mansion also honors Judge William Lewis with an exhibit looking at Lewis’ work, including the “Act for the Gradual Abolition of Slavery” in 1780, through the lens of the experience of the African American community of Philadelphia during the late 18th and early 19th century.

A visit to Historic Strawberry Mansion provides an informative and charming experience for groups of all ages.

HISTORY

Originally called “Summerville,” Historic Strawberry Mansion was built by Judge William Lewis in 1789. The Mansion represents two prominent styles of American architecture, and is filled with antiques, fine art, and collectible treasures that tell the story of some of Philadelphia’s most distinguished residents over a period of two centuries.

ARCHITECTURE

Historic Strawberry Mansion’s original structure was built in the popular Federal style. In 1828 the home’s second owner, Judge Joseph Hemphill, added two Greek Revival style wings. Restoration on Historic Strawberry Mansion began in 2009 and was completed in 2013. To this day the structure of the house remains largely unchanged, and has become one of the most celebrated historic houses in Philadelphia.
